Cross-linguistic influences in second language sentence processing

(第二言語の文処理における通言語的影響)

Abstract

It is uncontroversial that when using a second language (L2), a learner's first language is always active to varying degrees (Grojean, 1997; Odlin, 2012). In this talk, we will present data from a range of methods (explicit judgement tasks, self-paced reading, EEG) from our studies investigating how a learner's first language affects L2 learners' sentence processing. In a number of cases, we find that the results from highly time-sensitive methods offer a different picture of learners' knowledge to those tasks which arguably tap into more conscious or explicit processes. These results have implications both for theories of second language acquisition, and for how, on a more general, practical level, learners' knowledge of the L2 is assessed.
